If you want to enjoy the landscapes of Tenerife, you have to see them.

The islands is an intricate puzzle of culture and nature. A variety of geological forms, climatic idiosyncrasies and differences in altitude have given rise to a diversity of vegetation, with a wide array of feral and plant species. One of the largest protected natural areas, stretching over almost half of the island, is the national park.

Tenerife, the archipelago’s largest isle, is split into a thousand different landscapes. The flare incline of the western coast contrasts sharply with the winding beaches of the south. If you venture into the inland area, just below the treeline, you will come across mountain-covered habitats spread over the mountains and valleys. The range lines are also steeped in centuries-old traditions, and modernization has not yet diminished their historical and cultural value.

The coastline, beaches and cliffs

There are more than 40 vantage points for you to see all the landscapes of Tenerife. Beaches, cliffs, volcanoes, valleys, towns and villages, forests and peaks. More than 40 vantage points for you to see all the landscapes of Tenerife.

Cities between Europe and America

Tenerife has a specially designed network of roads for getting around, so you can discover the island’s landscapes in a relaxed way, at your own pace. The following are the main roads that form part of the network of roads.

Volcanoes and malpais or badlands

The first inhabitants of Tenerife found themselves faced with a choice between buildings and deforestation, depending on the type of land they found, as was the case with all the lands of the world. The eruption of Cumbre Vieja, in which a great deal of material was thrown into the atmosphere, provided material for the construction of the mountains.

Farming hamlets and villages at the treeline

The northwest areas are San Cristóbal de La Laguna and San Cristóbal de La Laguna, the southernmost point of the island. They are also the oldest. But the province of Santa Cruz de Tenerife is also inhabited by many native peoples who have lived here for centuries. Because of this, many of the areas have become the site of ancient and natural reserves.
